Knowledge and existing practices refer to the vital relationship between what learners already know and how they apply it, forming a foundation for deeper understanding, better retention, and expert performance this involves connecting new information to old, using strategies like active recall and problem solving and engaging in collaborative processes to build shared understanding ultimately turning information into meaningful applicable learning.

Physical restraints are devices or methods used to restrict a persons movement to prevent harm to themselves or others, common in medical psychiatric settings, examples include bed rails, vests, mitts but their use is ethically complex, carries risks and should be a last resort, replaced by alternatives like careful assessment and staff training for better care.
